Nishi, who provided opening remarks via a virtual platform. Their support underscored the university's commitment to fostering student talent and ensuring the continuity of such events amidst the pandemic. Participants were engaged in a range of performances including music, dance, drama, and poetry. The virtual format allowed students to present their talents through pre-recorded videos and live-streamed performances, adapting traditional elements of the event to an online environment.Highlights of the online Spectrum included live dance performances, vocal music, and dramatic monologues, all of which were broadcast through the university's digital channels. The event also featured interactive segments where viewers could engage with the performances through live chat and voting for their favorite acts.

Dr. Rishi commended the participants for their creativity and resilience, noting that the virtual setup did not diminish the vibrancy and enthusiasm of the event. Dr. Nishi praised the students for their adaptability and the quality of their performances, emphasizing that Spectrum continued to be a significant platform for student expression even in these challenging times. The event concluded with an award ceremony recognizing the top performers, and while the usual in-person interaction was missed, the online format proved to be an effective alternative that maintained the spirit of Spectrum. This successful adaptation of the talent hunt show highlights DAV University's dedication to supporting student activities and creativity, even during unprecedented times.
